Newsletter Engine

The Booked-Call Newsletter

5 ready-to-send emails and the system that turns your list into sales calls.

For coaches and consultants with a $3,000+ offer

The 5-minute version is on page 2

The 5-minute version

The Loom-to-Inbox System on one page

This is the whole method. Everything after this page shows you how to do each step, with emails you can send this week.

1

Email the people who already know you

Past leads, discovery calls that didn't close, past clients. Your next client is probably already in your contacts.

2

Talk for 5 minutes

Record a Loom about one client story, one mistake or one idea. You explain these on calls every day.

3

Turn it into one issue

Subject, opening, one idea, the bridge to your work, one ask. Same five parts every time.

4

Make one clear ask

A call invite or a question they can reply to. Never both, never three links.

5

Send it on the same day, every week

Consistency is what turns "not yet" into "let's talk." The calls come from the rhythm, not one great email.

If you only do one thing today: send the "not yet" email to 10 people who almost hired you. It takes 10 minutes, and it's in the "Do this today" section.

Start here

A newsletter that books calls is a sales tool with a content wrapper.

You'll know who to email, what to send and how to do it: about 25 minutes to write each issue, and 1 to 2 hours a week to run it all. Five complete emails are ready to adapt and send.

Most coaches treat a newsletter as content. That's why it doesn't book anything. The ones that book calls run on three things:

The right list

The people who already know you, not just new followers.

The right issue

One useful idea and one clear invitation, every week.

The right rhythm

The same day every week, without four hours of writing.

Then take the 2-minute scorecard. It tells you which part to fix first.

NE

Who's writing this. We're Imraan and Cameron, the team behind Newsletter Engine. We've built 20+ newsletters with 400,000+ subscribers across our clients' lists, and we write and send weekly newsletters for coaches. One of them is Paul, who runs Highspire, a business coaching program for construction company owners.

> "The newsletter has become a real driver for our coaching pipeline. Leads come in warm and already bought in. What surprised me most was how little effort it takes to keep running."
>
> Paul, Co-Founder, Highspire

Everything in this Playbook is what we do for Paul and our other clients, written so you can do it yourself.

Inside

What's in this Playbook

Tap any line to jump to it.

The Loom-to-Inbox System on one page	5 minutes
The scorecard	2 minutes
Do this today: the "not yet" email	Quick win
Three myths that keep coaches from emailing	Before you start
Who goes on the list	Step 1
Anatomy of a booked-call issue	Step 2
The welcome email that books calls	Step 3
Five ready-to-send emails	Step 4
The 5-minute Loom method	Step 5
How Highspire runs it	Real client
Your first 30 days	Your plan

This PDF is interactive

- Tick the boxes in the scorecard and the 30-day plan, and type in your score.
- Works in Adobe Acrobat Reader (free), Preview on Mac and Chrome. Save the file to keep your ticks.

2 minutes

The scorecard

Tick every statement that's true for you today. One point each.

Your list

- [ ] Past leads, call no-shows and "not yet" prospects are on my email list.
- [ ] Past clients are on my list, separate from prospects.
- [ ] I have a free resource that brings new people onto the list every week.

Your emails

- [ ] I've emailed my list at least 3 times in the last 30 days.
- [ ] New subscribers get a welcome email that tells them who I help and invites a call.
- [ ] Every email has exactly one call to action.
- [ ] At least once a month, an email directly invites readers to book a call.

Your system

- [ ] I send on the same day every week.
- [ ] Writing an issue takes me under 30 minutes.
- [ ] I know how many calls my emails booked last month.

My score _____ out of 10

Score	What it means	Read first
8 to 10	Your engine runs. You need more of the right people on the list.	Step 1: Who goes on the list
4 to 7	You're sending, but your emails aren't built to sell.	Step 2: Anatomy of an issue
0 to 3	You have an audience but no engine yet. This is the fastest score to improve.	Read it all, in order

Quick win

Do this today: the "not yet" email

Before you set up a single newsletter, email the people who almost hired you. It takes 10 minutes and it's the fastest way to a conversation this week.

Who to send it to

Ten people from the last 12 months who said "not yet," "let me think about it," or went quiet after a discovery call. Send each one on its own, from your own inbox, and fill in the details by hand.

Subject: Still working on [their goal] ?

Hi [first name] ,

When we spoke in [month] , you were working on [their goal] and the timing wasn't right.

It came back to mind this week because [a client in the same spot just had a breakthrough / something you've learned since] .

No pitch here. I'm curious: is [their goal] still on your list this year?

If it is, I have a couple of 20-minute slots next week and I'm happy to share what's working for [people like them] right now. Either way, I'd love to hear how it's going.

[Your name]

It's about them
It reminds them of their goal, not your offer.

It has a real reason
"It came back to mind because..." makes it personal, not a sequence.

It asks one easy question
Yes or no is easy to reply to on a phone.

Every reply is a lead
Ask the ones who reply if they'd like your weekly email too.

Before you start

Three myths that keep coaches from emailing

Most coaches know they should email their list. Three beliefs stop them. All three are wrong.

Myth 1

~~"Nobody reads email anymore."~~

They do, when it comes from someone they chose to hear from. Weekly newsletters averaged a 34% open rate across 4 billion emails in GetResponse's study. In Litmus' 2025 survey, 30% of companies reported $36 to $50 back for every $1 spent on email.

Compare that with a social post, where the algorithm decides who sees it. Your followers belong to the platform. Your list belongs to you.

Myth 2

~~"I'm not a writer, and I don't have time."~~

You don't need to write. You need to talk. You already explain your best ideas out loud every day, on calls with clients. The 5-minute Loom method (Step 5) turns one of those explanations into an issue in about 25 minutes. It sounds like you, because it is you.

Myth 3

~~"My list is too small to matter."~~

A newsletter for a high-ticket coach isn't a numbers game. If your offer is $3,000 or more, one new client from email a quarter pays for the effort many times over.

And your list is probably bigger than you think. The discovery call that ended with "let me think about it." The lead who went quiet after a DM. The past client who'd refer you if you crossed their mind. None of them said no. They said "not now," and nobody followed up.

Step 1

Who goes on the list

A list of 300 people who already know you will book more calls than 3,000 strangers. Start with the five sources you already have, and tag each contact by where they came from.

Source	Where to find them	Tag as
Discovery calls that didn't close	Your calendar and CRM, last 12 months	Warm prospect
Leads who went quiet	Inquiry forms, DMs, old email threads	Warm prospect
Past and current clients	Invoices, contracts, your program roster	Client
Event and webinar attendees	Registration exports	Cold prospect
Social and podcast audience	Link in bio, show notes, a pinned post	New subscriber

Ask first, then add

Most email platforms require that people agreed to hear from you. So send this from your own inbox, one person at a time or in small batches. It protects your deliverability and starts conversations.

Subject: Quick one

Hi [first name],

I'm starting a short weekly email on [your topic] for [who you help]. One idea a week, under 3 minutes to read.

Want in? Just reply "yes" and I'll add you.

Add everyone who says yes. The replies themselves are warm conversations, so answer every one.

Keep new people coming in

Offer one free resource that solves a single problem for your ideal client, the way this Playbook does for you. Put it in your link in bio, your email signature, the end of every podcast episode and your booking page.

Step 2

Anatomy of a booked-call issue

Every issue that books calls has the same five parts, in the same order. Content without the last two is just content.

1. Subject line She almost canceled our second call	Specific beats clever: a person, a number or a mistake your reader would recognize.
2. Opening Last Tuesday, a client told me...	Start mid-story. The first two lines decide whether they keep reading.
3. One idea The real reason she was stuck...	Teach one thing they can use today, in 300 to 500 words.
4. The bridge This is what we fix in month one.	Tie the lesson to the work you do, so the reader sees you can help with it.
5. One call to action Book a 20-minute call: [link]	One link only. Alternate a call invite with a question readers can reply to.

The bridge is the part most coaches skip. Without it, readers learn from you and then hire someone else, because nothing connected the lesson to working with you.

Step 3

The welcome email that books calls

Your welcome email is the most-read email you'll ever send: welcome emails averaged an 84% open rate in GetResponse's study, against 34% for weekly newsletters. Use it to say who you help, what to expect, and how to get on a call.

Subject: You're in. Here's what happens next

Hi [first name],

Thanks for joining. Quick intro: I help [who you help] [get a specific result] without [the thing they hate].

Every [day], you'll get one email from me. One idea, one story from my work with clients, under 3 minutes to read. You can unsubscribe in one click.

Before the first one lands, I'm curious: what's the biggest thing standing between you and [the result] right now? Hit reply and tell me. I read every answer.

And if you'd rather talk it through, I keep a few 20-minute calls open each week for [who you help]: [booking link]

Talk soon,
[Your name]

P.S. The email people tell me they like most is [link to your best issue]. Start there.

Why it works

- The reply question starts real conversations, and replies help your future emails reach the inbox.
- The call offer is soft and specific. "A few 20-minute calls each week" reads as an invitation, not a pitch.
- The P.S. gets read. Use it to send people to your best proof.

Step 4

Five ready-to-send emails

Each one is written in full for an example coach, Dana, who coaches first-time managers. Keep the structure, swap in your own story, and you have a month of issues.

Email 1 of 5: The client story

Shape: where they were, the moment it clicked, what changed, the one lesson.

Subject: She almost canceled our second call

Hi [first name],

Maya almost canceled our second session.

She'd been promoted to engineering manager six weeks earlier and was working 60-hour weeks. Her plan was to push through until things "settled down." Our call felt like one more meeting she didn't have time for.

Ten minutes in, she said what I hear from almost every new manager: "It's faster if I just do it myself."

That sentence was costing her 20 hours a week. She was still doing her old job, plus her new one.

So we changed one thing. For two weeks, every time she reached for a task, she asked: "Who on my team would grow by doing this?" Then she handed it off, even when it took longer the first time.

By the end of the quarter she was down to 45 hours, and two of her engineers had stepped up in ways she hadn't expected.

The lesson: as a manager, your job isn't to do the work faster. It's to build a team that can.

If you're where Maya was, that's exactly what we work on in the first 30 days of coaching. Grab a 20-minute call here: [booking link]

Dana

Other subject lines: "From 60-hour weeks to 45 in one quarter" / "It's faster if I just do it myself"

Subject
A person and a moment, not a topic.

Opening
Starts mid-story, so they keep reading.

One idea
"Your job is to build a team that can."

Bridge and ask
"That's what we work on in the first 30 days" plus one link.

Step 4: email 2 of 5

Email 2 of 5: The mistake I keep seeing

Shape: name the mistake bluntly, show what it costs, give the fix in 3 steps.

Subject: The 1:1 mistake I see every week

Hi [first name],

Most new managers run their one-on-ones like status meetings.

"What are you working on? Any blockers? Great, see you next week."

It feels efficient. It's actually the most expensive 30 minutes of your week, because you get updates you could have read in Slack and miss the things your team won't say anywhere else.

Here's the fix, in three steps:

1. Let them set the agenda. Ask them to bring the first topic.
2. Ask one question about them, not the work. "What's draining you right now?" works.
3. End with one thing you'll do for them before next week, and then do it.

Try it this week with one person and watch what changes.

Not sure if your one-on-ones have slipped into status meetings? Reply with "check" and I'll send you the 5 questions I use to tell.

Dana

Other subject lines: "Stop running your 1:1s like this" / "The most expensive 30 minutes of your week"

Subject
Names a mistake the reader suspects they're making.

One idea
A fix they can use in their next meeting.

The ask
A reply, not a call. Replies start conversations.

Why it sells
Readers who reply "check" are telling you they need help.

Step 4: email 3 of 5

Email 3 of 5: The framework

Shape: the problem, your 3-step framework with one line each, a question for the reader.

Subject: How I plan a new manager's first 90 days

Hi [first name],

Every new manager gets the same advice from their boss: "Take it slow, learn the team."

It's not wrong. It's just not a plan. Here's the one I use with clients, in three phases:

Days 1 to 30: Listen. A one-on-one with every report, and one question for everyone: "What should I not change?"
Days 31 to 60: Pick one win. Find the one thing slowing the team down that you can fix in a month, and fix it visibly.
Days 61 to 90: Set the rhythm. Team goals, a weekly cadence and how decisions get made.

Most managers skip straight to phase 3. That's why their first changes get pushback.

This is step one of how I work with clients. If you'd like to map your own 90 days with me, here's a time to talk: [booking link]

Dana

Other subject lines: "The 90-day plan I give every new manager" / "Don't change anything in your first month"

Subject
A specific promise: a plan, with a timeframe.

One idea
The framework, taught for free.

Bridge
"This is step one of how I work with clients."

Why it sells
Readers see how you think before they pay for it.

Step 4: email 4 of 5

Email 4 of 5: The opinion

Shape: what everyone's saying, why you see it differently, what to do instead.

Subject: Unpopular opinion: stop asking for feedback

Hi [first name],

Every leadership book says the same thing: ask your team for feedback.

My unpopular opinion: most new managers shouldn't. Not yet.

When you ask "Any feedback for me?" in a one-on-one, you're asking someone to criticize their boss, to their face, with no warning. Almost everyone says "No, all good." You walk away thinking you're doing great.

Instead, ask for something small and specific: "What's one thing I could do differently in our team meetings?" A narrow question makes it safe to answer honestly. Do that for a month, act on what you hear, and the bigger feedback starts arriving on its own.

Agree or disagree? Hit reply and tell me. I read every answer.

Dana

Other subject lines: "The leadership advice I disagree with" / "Why 'any feedback for me?' never works"

Subject
Disagreeing with common advice gets opened.

One idea
A clear stance, plus what to do instead.

The ask
"Agree or disagree?" is the easiest reply there is.

Why it sells
Opinions make you memorable, not interchangeable.

Step 4: email 5 of 5

Email 5 of 5: The direct invitation

Shape: who it's for, the result, how many spots, how to book. Under 150 words. Once a month.

Subject: 3 coaching spots open in November

Hi [first name] ,

Short one today.

I take on a small number of new coaching clients each month, and I have 3 spots open for November.

It's a fit if you:
• Were promoted into management in the last 12 months
• Lead a team of 3 to 15 people
• Feel like you're doing two jobs and want to do one well

Over 90 days, we'll get your hours back, set up one-on-ones that work, and build a team that doesn't need you for every decision.

If that's you, grab a time here: [booking link]

If not, no worries at all. See you next week.

Dana

Other subject lines: "Is this you?" / "Taking on 3 new managers this month"

Who it's for
Three bullets let the right people say "that's me."

Real scarcity
Only use a spot count that's true.

The result
What changes in 90 days, in plain words.

No pressure
"If not, no worries" keeps the list happy.

Step 5

The 5-minute Loom method

This is the heart of the Loom-to-Inbox System. You already explain your best ideas out loud every day, so record one and turn it into the issue instead of writing from scratch.

1. Pick the prompt 1 min
   Choose one of the five emails and answer one question out loud: What did a client struggle with this week? What mistake did I see again? What would I tell a new client on day one?

2. Record it 5 min
   Use Loom, a voice memo or any recorder. Talk the way you would to one client. Story first, then the lesson. Don't script it.

3. Transcribe it 2 min
   Loom and most recorders transcribe automatically.

4. Shape it 15 min
   Cut the transcript to 300 to 500 words. Keep your phrases and stories, cut the throat-clearing. Add a subject line and one call to action.

5. Schedule it 2 min
   Same day, same time, every week.

About 25 minutes per issue, and it sounds like you, because it is you. Add replies, list upkeep and tracking, and running it well takes 1 to 2 hours a week.

Tips that make the difference

- Record when it's fresh, right after a good client call, while the example is vivid.
- Keep a running list of client questions in your phone. That list is next month's issues.
- Read it out loud before sending. If a sentence wouldn't come out of your mouth on a call, rewrite it.

Real client

How Highspire runs it

Highspire is a business coaching program for construction company owners. This is the same system, done for them every week.

The client	Paul, Co-Founder of Highspire. A high-ticket coaching offer that sells on calls.
The problem	A busy founder with no consistent way to stay in front of prospects between sales conversations.
What we built	The full newsletter system: setup, design, and a weekly email built to warm leads before they ever get on a call.
How it runs	We handle the writing, design and sending every week, using the same five-part structure you've seen in this Playbook.

> "The newsletter has become a real driver for our coaching pipeline. Leads come in warm and already bought in. What surprised me most was how little effort it takes to keep running."
>
> Paul, Co-Founder, Highspire

"Already bought in" is the point. When someone has read you every week for two months, the sales call stops being a pitch. It becomes a conversation about when to start.

Your plan

Your first 30 days

One small job a day for the first week, then one issue a week. By day 30 you'll have sent four issues and know which ones get replies.

Week 1: set up

- [ ] Day 1: send the "not yet" email to 10 people, and pick your weekly send day
- [ ] Day 2: list every contact from the five sources and tag them
- [ ] Day 3: send the permission email to your warm contacts
- [ ] Day 4: write your welcome email from Step 3
- [ ] Day 5: set up a 20-minute call type on your booking link
- [ ] Day 6: record your first Loom (email 1, the client story)
- [ ] Day 7: shape it and schedule it

Weeks 2 to 4: send and learn

- [ ] Week 2: send email 2, the mistake I keep seeing
- [ ] Week 3: send email 3, the framework
- [ ] Week 4: send email 5, the direct invitation (save email 4 for month 2)
- [ ] Every week: answer every reply within a day
- [ ] Day 30: count opens, replies and calls booked, and note which issue did best

What good looks like at day 30: every issue sent on time, a handful of replies, and at least one conversation that wouldn't have happened otherwise. Calls build from there, as your list gets used to hearing from you.

Or skip the learning curve entirely.

Everything in this playbook works. But there's a reason our clients get results faster than people who do it themselves. We've built and optimised hundreds of newsletter setups. We know which subscribe page layouts convert cold traffic, which welcome sequences actually get opened, and which segmentation triggers move subscribers from passive to engaged. That knowledge took years to build. You don't have to start from scratch.

When we run it for you:

Design and Infrastructure

- Custom website design including homepage, subscribe page, thank you page, link in bio, and all internal pages
- Up to 4 extra pages (services, about, etc.) plus welcome email design
- Conversion blocks with social proof, FAQ, and mockups that actually convert
- Branded thumbnail templates and logo variants
- 1 month of technical and strategy support included
- Result: 20-50% higher conversion rate on existing traffic

Automations and Core Systems

- Full automation setup: welcome series, re-engagement flows, polls, segmentation, and smart CTAs
- Survey setup to understand exactly what your audience wants
- Custom confirmation page that boosts open rates by 10%+
- Primary tab placement optimisation to protect deliverability
- 15+ audience segments that automatically adapt to subscriber behaviour

Weekly Content

- We write your newsletter every week in your voice, from a 5-minute Loom recording
- Works with YouTube and podcast content repurposing too
- Result: 50-60% average open rates, stronger engagement loops

FB Ads Growth

- Full Meta Pixel setup, 3 winning ad creatives, and 2 landing page A/B test variants
- Ad campaign blueprint with full walkthrough
- Result: $0.10-$3 per subscriber across coaching and consulting newsletters

Newsletter OS Dashboard

- Every client gets our custom Notion OS covering growth strategy, monetisation tracking, analytics, writing workflow, and playbooks that compound over time

---

The playbook tells you what to do. We've already done it hundreds of times and know exactly what works.

Newsletter Engine

Run it yourself, or have us run it.

Everything in this Playbook works if you do it yourself. Most coaches who stall don't stall on knowing what to do. They stall in week 3, when client work gets busy and the newsletter is the first thing to slip.

Run it yourself if...

you have 1 to 2 hours a week you can protect, every week, you enjoy writing, and you're happy managing the email platform. Start with the 30-day plan.

Have us run the Loom-to-Inbox System for you if...

you'd rather spend those hours on client calls. Your part is a 5-minute Loom each week. We handle the writing in your voice, design, welcome sequence, list growth and a monthly report on calls booked.

$2,000 a month, or $5,400 for 3 months paid upfront

Setup included, first issue within 7 days

Approve issue one, or don't pay

What we've seen with clients

50 to 60%

open rates on the first 3 welcome emails

15 to 20%

higher opens once past clients and prospects get their own messages

Inbox, not spam

Re-engagement flows that keep your emails landing as your list grows

Book a free 20-minute strategy call. We'll look at your list and your offer, and map out your newsletter, whether you work with us or not.

Book your free strategy call

Either way, start this week. The leads who said "not yet" won't wait forever.

© 2026 Newsletter Engine newsletterengine.io